Spiral petroglyph and pictograph images are commonly found throughout the Southwest and are associated with wind, water, spiritual emergence, and an individual's journey through life.

How did Are.na come to be?

Around 2006, I met John Michael Boling through a social bookmarking website called Del.icio.us. Your Del.icio.us profile ended up being a nice representation of what you were interested in and actively thinking about.

Del.icio.us let you see the constellation of people with similar interests. For example, maybe you see that 20 other people saved the same link you did. Then you can look through these peoples' saved links and learn about things you had never considered before. I met John Michael simply through us saving many of the same links and finding there was a lot of overlap.

Were you a student around then?

Yeah. Cory Arcangel, who was my professor at the time, introduced me to Del.icio.us. He made everyone in class use it. The first part of class was everyone talking through some links they found on the internet. People would bring in things that may not seem interesting at first, but Cory was amazing at parsing out why something might be interesting. It showed you it's important to think deeply about why you like what you like.

"You're in college and should be interested in everything" was Cory's whole point with the link sharing. You have to open your brain to many different things and investigate them. It's the primary time when you can develop those ideas and habits for the rest of your life.
